American Diplomacy in Greece. If Russia have friends in various quarters of the globe, it is certain that she has enemies in as many. To do the advisers of the Czar justice, they neglect no opportunity that diplomacy or cunning allows to establish amicable relations in all parts of the world.

From Athens to New York, from Amoy to Paraguay, from the fiords of Norway to the pampas of South America, Russian agency is busily at work-with bribes, where bribes are acceptable, and with threats, where bribery is of no avail -to construct and complete her net work of political influence. Long ago the instinct of the English people pointed to Sweden and Norway as the countries where it was essential to meet and combat the arts of the Czar; and we now find that the governments of France and Great Britain, lagging behind the people, have at the eleventh hour judged it inexpedient to try whether it be possible to enlist the Scandinavian nations in the great European league against Russia We shall have occasion hereafter to advert to the mission of General Cantobert to the Court of Stockholm. In the meantime, wishing all success to a mission which has been but too long delayed, we wish to direct attention to the affairs of Greece -a country where Russian influence is predominant-and as regards which a new competitor, boding mischief, has suddenly started up. The government of the United States, strange as , and has been for some years past, it is but natuit may seem, is desirous to obtain a foot in ancient ral that we find a large number of persons who well Hellas, by the purchase of one or more of the mulitimerit the title of "green 'uns."
